At bottom, the dissent hopes to revive that old-time devotion to legislative history. See, e.g., Church of Holy Trinity v. United States, 143 U. S. 457, 464–465 (1892). Instead of winning converts, however, the dissent illustrates why statutory interpretation must focus on the text—or, to borrow from Justice Robert Jackson, why interpretation must be driven by "analysis of the statute" rather than "psychoanalysis of Congress." United States v. Public Util. Comm'n of Cal., 345 U. S. 295, 319 (1953) (concurring opinion).

* * *

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

JUSTICE KAGAN, dissenting.

Page Proof Pending Publication

My views about the proper use of legislative history in statutory interpretation fall someplace in between the majority's and the principal dissent's. The one-sentence version is: Reliance on legislative history may be appropriate when statutory text in context remains, after careful review, stubbornly ambiguous. I do not find Section 47(b) to exhibit such a lack of clarity. For the reasons JUSTICE JACKSON gives in Parts I and II of her dissenting opinion, the text, structure, and statutory history of Section 47(b) support recognition of a private right of action. I therefore gladly join those parts of JUSTICE JACKSON's dissent, while abstaining from the opinions' further debate about the meaning of the House and Senate Reports.

JUSTICE JACKSON, with whom JUSTICE SOTOMAYOR joins, and with whom JUSTICE KAGAN joins as to Parts I and II, dissenting.

I agree with the Court that "Congress, not the Judiciary, decides who may enforce the law." Ante, at 611. It is for that