States, so staying the District Court's injunction will not concretely harm them. The Court's disposition of this application does not mean that any measure taken by the Government to implement the order will necessarily be lawful. The District Court's injunction is stayed pending further appellate proceedings. The application in No. 26A139 is denied as moot.

No. 26A124, application for stay granted; No. 26A139, application for stay denied as moot.

PER CURIAM.

The President recently issued an Executive Order regarding election integrity. A group of States sued the Government in the District of Massachusetts, contending that the Order unconstitutionally infringes on their authority to administer elections. The District Court agreed and enjoined the Government from implementing the Order. In doing so, the District Court rejected the Government's argument that it lacked jurisdiction over the States' claims because the States lack standing to bring them. The Government has asked us to stay the injunction, arguing that it is likely to succeed on the merits of its jurisdictional argument, that the injunction is causing it irreparable harm, and that the equities do not favor leaving the injunction in place while the Government's appeal is pending. We agree and grant the stay.

Page Proof Pending Publication

I

About five months ago, President Trump issued an Executive Order designed to maintain public confidence in federal elections. See Exec. Order No. 14399, 91 Fed. Reg. 17125 (2026). The Order is an internal directive from the President to his subordinates mandating that certain agencies pursue certain policies. It neither requires nor forbids anything of anyone outside the Executive Branch. Three sections of the Order are relevant here.

First, § 2(a) orders the Secretary of Homeland Security to "take appropriate action to" create and send "State Citizenship List[s]" to each State. Ibid. These Lists will catalog the residents of each State who are U. S. citizens and "who will be above the age of 18 at the time of an upcoming Federal election." Ibid. States are not required to use the Lists, and the Secretary may compile and transmit them only "[t]o the extent feasible and consistent with applicable law." Id., at 17125–17126.

Second, § 2(b) requires the Attorney General to "prioritize the investigation and, as appropriate, the prosecution of State and local officials or any others" who issue federal ballots to ineligible voters. Id., at 17126.

Third, § 3(b) directs the Postal Service to "initiate a proposed rulemaking" that includes several "[p]roposed provisions." Ibid. One such provision is that outbound ballot envelopes must contain a unique barcode to facilitate tracking. Ibid. The Order does not demand that any proposed provision appear in the final rule. Id., at 17126–17127.

All provisions of the Order must "be implemented consistent with applicable law." Id., at 17127.

Page Proof Pending Publication

A few days after the Order was issued, a group of States and the District of Columbia (hereinafter "States") filed suit in the District of Massachusetts. As relevant here, the States argued that §§ 2 and 3 are unconstitutional and sought to enjoin their implementation; the Government countered that the States' suit is not justiciable because the Order does not injure them. The District Court largely agreed with the States and entered a final judgment forbidding the Government to implement §§ 2 and 3 as to them for the upcoming midterms. After the First Circuit denied the Government's request for a stay, the Government sought a stay from this Court.

To secure a stay pending appeal, the Government must show that it is likely to succeed on the merits and that it is likely to suffer irreparable harm without a stay. See Trump v. Cook, 609 U. S. 528, 541 (2026). It must also demonstrate that the balance of equities does not counsel against relief. See ibid. Of these factors, the likelihood of success on the merits and the likelihood of irreparable harm "are the most critical." Nken v. Holder, 556 U. S. 418, 434 (2009).[1]

II

As to the first factor: The Government is likely to prevail on the merits of its argument that the District Court lacked jurisdiction to enter the judgment.

Two related doctrines of justiciability block the States' suit. One is standing, which requires "an injury that is concrete, particularized, and imminent rather than 'conjectural or hypothetical.'" Carney v. Adams, 592 U. S. 53, 60 (2020). The other is ripeness, which forbids federal courts to adjudicate disputes that are "dependent on 'contingent future events that may not occur as anticipated, or indeed may not occur at all.'" Trump v. New York, 592 U. S. 125, 131 (2020) (per curiam). Because "standing is not dispensed in gross," we address each challenged provision of the Order separately. TransUnion LLC v. Ramirez, 594 U. S. 413, 431 (2021).

Page Proof Pending Publication

A

Section 2(a) directs the Secretary of Homeland Security to take appropriate action to create and distribute State Citizenship Lists. This provision is an internal directive from the President to a subordinate. It imposes no obligations on the States, so they "suffer no concrete harm from" it. Trump v. New York, 592 U. S., at 134. And without concrete harm, there is no standing. TransUnion, 594 U. S., at 442.

The true "source of any injury" to the States would be the downstream action that the Secretary "might take in the future" to implement § 2(a). Trump v. New York, 592 U. S., at 133–134. Emphasis on might. Section 2(a) can be implemented only "[t]o the extent feasible and consistent with applicable law." 91 Fed. Reg. 17125. And as the Court explained in another case involving a Presidential directive with a similar qualifier: "Any prediction how the Executive Branch might eventually implement" § 2(a) while balancing feasibility and lawfulness "is 'no more than conjecture' at this time." Trump v. New York, 592 U. S., at 131. The Secretary's "eventual action will reflect both legal and practical constraints, making any prediction about future injury just that—a prediction." Id., at 133; see 91 Fed. Reg. 17125.

[1] The States do not dispute that this application presents a significant legal question. Trump v. Cook, 609 U. S., at 541.

To see why, consider the unduly long "chain of inferences" necessary to support the States' supposedly concrete injury. Clapper v. Amnesty Int'l USA, 568 U. S. 398, 414–415, n. 5 (2013). The District Court first had to speculate about whether it would be "feasible" for the Secretary to create and transmit the Lists before the midterms. 91 Fed. Reg. 17125. But § 2(a) "may not prove feasible to implement in any manner whatsoever." Trump v. New York, 592 U. S., at 132. The court then had to guess how the Secretary might tailor his implementation to be "consistent with applicable law." 91 Fed. Reg. 17125. Next, the court had to predict what "action" the Secretary would deem "appropriate" for implementing § 2(a). Ibid. After all that, the court still had to estimate whether those actions would be taken "in a manner substantially likely to harm" the States. Trump v. New York, 592 U. S., at 132. But Article III prohibits federal courts from stacking hypothetical on hypothetical to speculate that harm will eventually materialize. Clapper, 568 U. S., at 414–415, n. 5. Adjudicating this claim requires a prediction not only about whether the Secretary will act before the midterms, but also about the shape that any such action might ultimately take. Article III demands more certainty.

The lower courts saw it differently, concluding that the States suffered "a present injury" from § 2(a) because it required them "to begin planning now on how to comply with" it. App. to Application in No. 26A124, pp. 7a–8a. But the States "cannot manufacture standing merely by inflicting harm on themselves based on their fears of hypothetical future harm that is not certainly impending." Clapper, 568 U. S., at 416. And the hypothetical future harm that the States fear—the Secretary's implementation of § 2(a)—is far from "certainly impending." Ibid. By allowing the States "to bring this action based on costs they incurred in response to a speculative threat," the District Court "improperly water[ed] down the fundamental requirements of Article III." Ibid.

Perhaps recognizing the weakness of that standing rationale, the Court of Appeals added another: § 2(a) infringes the States' sovereign authority to create election rules. But § 2(a) does no such thing. Instead, it simply directs the Secretary to take certain actions if appropriate, feasible, and lawful. 91 Fed. Reg. 17125–17126. This internal directive does not regulate the States' voter registration processes. Nor does it impinge on the States' authority "'to create and enforce a legal code' for elections." Contra, App. to Application in No. 26A124, p. 13a.

Page Proof Pending Publication

B

The States lack standing to challenge § 2(b) for much the same reason: It does nothing to them. This provision directs the Attorney General to "prioritize" the investigation and prosecution of those who violate existing federal laws by issuing ballots to ineligible voters. 91 Fed. Reg. 17126 (collecting statutes). Setting prosecutorial priorities lies within the President's Article II power. And his decision to prioritize the prosecution of certain offenses does not inflict a traditionally recognized harm on the States. See TransUnion, 594 U. S., at 424–425.

The States try to avoid this straightforward analysis by misreading the Order. They insist that § 2(b) credibly threatens them with prosecution if they do not use the Citizenship Lists from § 2(a). See Opposition to Applications 21–22, 29–30; see also post, at 1043–1044 (SOTOMAYOR, J., dissenting); post, at 1058–1059 (JACKSON, J., dissenting). But that view is inconsistent with the text of § 2. The States concede that § 2(a) does not require them to use the Lists at all (assuming they receive them in the first place). Opposition to Applications 21. So it is logically impossible for a State to "violate" § 2(a)—and § 2(b) does not suggest otherwise. Section 2(b) directs the Attorney General to "prioritize" prosecutions of those who violate federal election laws. It then provides an array of existing statutes for the Attorney General to enforce. 91 Fed. Reg. 17126. Absent is any reference to Citizenship Lists. Without a textual basis for their concerns, the States lack a "well-founded fear" that they will be prosecuted for not using the Lists. Virginia v. American Booksellers Assn., Inc., 484 U. S. 383, 393 (1988).

The States' reference to certain state laws allowing 17-year-olds to vote in primary elections is a red herring. See Opposition to Applications 29–30. Because § 2(b) defines eligible voters as otherwise qualified citizens who are "18 years of age or older," 91 Fed. Reg. 17126, the States insist that they face a real threat of prosecution if they deliver a ballot to a 17-year-old who is eligible to vote in a primary under state law. Not so. Section 7(b) of the Order requires § 2(b) to "be implemented consistent with applicable law." Id., at 17127. And on top of that, § 2(b) limits itself to only "appropriate" prosecutions. Id., at 17126. Given these provisions, the Government has unsurprisingly disavowed any intention to prosecute state officials for lawfully providing ballots to 17-year-olds.

Page Proof Pending Publication

C

Last is the States' challenge to § 3, which directs the Postal Service to issue a notice of proposed rulemaking. According to the States, this internal directive demands that they overhaul their existing election procedures. See Opposition to Applications 24–26; see also post, at 1045, 1047, 1051 (opinion of JACKSON, J.). It does not. Section 3 orders the Postal Service to initiate the process of proposing a rule that might bind the States in the future. It is not a proposed rule, let alone a final rule. And it imposes no legal requirements on the States (or, for that matter, on anyone outside the Executive Branch).

The District Court's conclusion that this internal directive inflicts an Article III injury on the States necessarily rests on an "attenuated chain of inferences." Clapper, 568 U. S., at 414–415, n. 5. At the time this suit was filed—the time when standing is measured—the District Court had to engage in a string of speculations to find this suit justiciable. It first had to speculate about whether the Postal Service would propose a rule. Then it had to speculate about how the agency would weigh the comments it received. Cf. Perez v. Mortgage Bankers Assn., 575 U. S. 92, 96 (2015) (emphasizing that agencies typically "must consider and respond to significant comments"). Then it had to speculate about whether the agency would issue a final rule. See Long Island Care at Home, Ltd. v. Coke, 551 U. S. 158, 175 (2007) (explaining that a proposed rule is "simply a proposal," and an agency "might choose to adopt the proposal or to withdraw it"). Then it had to speculate about what the final rule would say. Cf. Encino Motorcars, LLC v. Navarro, 579 U. S. 211, 218 (2016) (noting that the final rule "took the opposite position from the proposed rule"). Finally, after all that, the District Court still had to speculate about whether the text of a hypothetical final rule would harm the States. It should go without saying that the District Court made a decision "dependent on 'contingent future events that may not occur as anticipated, or indeed may not occur at all.'" Trump v. New York, 592 U. S., at 131.

Page Proof Pending Publication

The States cannot preemptively concretize their injury by expending funds before the Postal Service finalizes a rule. Spending money to hedge against a "speculative threat" does not constitute an Article III injury. Clapper, 568 U. S., at 416. Though it may sometimes be "a reasonable reaction" to "incu[r] certain costs" in advance of a final rule, those costs cannot establish standing when the final rule remains a "hypothetical future harm that is not certainly impending." Ibid. Federal courts review final rules, not proposed rules—and certainly not antecedent internal directives to propose a rule. If the Postal Service's final rule harms the States, they may challenge that rule.

III

The remaining stay factors also favor relief. The Government is likely to suffer irreparable harm without a stay. The District Court's breach of Article III interferes with the internal operations of the Executive Branch. See INS v. Legalization Assistance Project of Los Angeles County Federation of Labor, 510 U. S. 1301, 1306 (1993) (O'Connor, J., in chambers). The injunction bars Homeland Security from trying to compile Citizenship Lists for about half the States in the Union. It purports to forbid the Attorney General to implement the President's enforcement priorities as to those same States.[2] And it prevents the Postal Service from so much as initiating a rulemaking that could yield a rule applicable to these States. Because reversal of the District Court's judgment would come too late for the 2026 midterms, the District Court's errors deal "a serious setback" to the

Page Proof Pending Publication

[2] The principal dissent suggests that, if the Order does not legally bind the States, then the Government cannot suffer irreparable harm from the injunction. See post, at 1044 (opinion of SOTOMAYOR, J.). The dissent reasons that this is so because the injunction merely prohibits prosecutions "'stemming from violations or purported violations of the unconstitutional provisions in'" the Order. Ibid. And if it is impossible to violate the Order, then the injunction targets a null set of conduct, so the Government suffers no harm at all. Ibid. But the injunction is far broader than the dissent lets on. It declares all of §2 ultra vires as to the States, blocks the Government from "giving effect to" §2 as to the States, and requires the Government "to prevent explicit or implicit implementation of" §2 as to the States. Final Judgment in No. 1:26–cv–11581 (D Mass.), ECF Doc. 207, pp. 2–4. It is the breadth of these provisions—and the resulting intrusion into the Executive Branch's internal operations—that irreparably harms the Government.

Executive's "goals" while this litigation unfolds. Coleman v. Paccar Inc., 424 U. S. 1301, 1307 (1976) (Rehnquist, J., in chambers). When a federal court "improperly intrudes on a coordinate branch" in this way, interim relief is justified. Trump v. CASA, Inc., 606 U. S. 831, 859 (2025) (alterations and internal quotation marks omitted).

Fighting this Court's precedent, JUSTICE JACKSON maintains that "[t]he Government is not injured in the slightest" because the Order contemplates that the Government will engage in "patently unlawful conduct." Post, at 1051. That, however, remains to be seen. And though JUSTICE JACKSON wishes it were otherwise, an applicant can show "irreparable harm from a threshold error without also showing that, at the end of the day, it will prevail on the underlying merits." CASA, 606 U. S., at 860. Such harm exists here because the injunction meddles in "the workings of" the Executive Branch, preventing it from even trying to lawfully implement the Order. Legalization Assistance Project, 510 U. S., at 1306.

Page Proof Pending Publication

Finally, "the balance of equities does not counsel against awarding the Government interim relief." CASA, 606 U. S., at 861. The Executive Order makes no demand of the States, so staying the District Court's injunction will not concretely harm them. That is why this suit was not justiciable in the first place.

* * *

The Court's disposition of this application does not mean that any measure taken by the Government to implement the Order will necessarily be lawful. On that score, time will tell. But the Order itself does not harm the States, so the District Court lacked jurisdiction to bar the Government from trying to implement it. And for the reasons discussed, that injunction is likely to irreparably harm the Government if it remains in place while the appellate process runs its course.

Accordingly, the application for stay presented to JUSTICE JACKSON in No. 26A124 and by her referred to the Court is granted. The injunction entered by the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts in case No. 1:26–cv–11581 is stayed pending the disposition of the appeal in the United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit and disposition of a petition for a writ of certiorari in this Court, if such a writ is timely sought. Should certiorari be denied, this stay shall terminate automatically. In the event certiorari is granted, the stay shall terminate upon the sending down of the judgment of this Court. The application for stay presented to JUSTICE JACKSON in No. 26A139 and by her referred to the Court is denied as moot.

JUSTICE SOTOMAYOR, with whom JUSTICE KAGAN joins, dissenting.

Today's decision does not address whether the President's attempts to interfere with States' administration of the November 2026 elections are lawful. Nor does it suggest that the Executive Branch has any constitutional or statutory authority to implement the President's directives. Instead, today's decision merely postpones adjudication of those challenges. Nonetheless, because I believe the respondent States' challenges are justiciable now, I respectfully dissent.

A commonsense reading of the Executive Order, corroborated by the Government's own representations, makes clear that the respondent States face a sufficiently concrete and imminent injury to satisfy Article III. Section 2 of the Executive Order has two subsections. Subsection 2(a) orders the Secretary of Homeland Security to create state Citizenship Lists of "confirmed" citizens who will be over the age of 18 as of an upcoming federal election. Subsection 2(b) then directs the Attorney General to prioritize the investigation and prosecution of state and local officials who provide ballots to individuals who are not eligible to vote, citing statutes prohibiting non-citizens from voting. The majority ac-

Page Proof Pending Publication